

After reviewing Common Carrier Bureau Seeks Comment on Numbering Audit Program, cc docket No. 99-98 document several thoughts come to mind.

The level proposed for an audit would recreate the report issued by a company, not a review report issued for correctness. This seems to be a step that would add additional cost and time to an audit. Rather than verifying that companies are complying with the requirements. This seems to be a prevailing attitude of overkill in order to see if the reports are reasonable accurate.

And, with the depth that is proposed in this audit, I ask the questions at what level of accuracy is meaningful and what is the objective of the information gathered from the numbering report, is it a tool to solve a future problem or just a means to justify a new level of government.
